Tobacco Aside, E-Cigarette Flavorings May Harm Blood Vessels

Flavoring chemicals widely used in e-cigarettes and other tobacco products may be toxic to the cells that line and regulate blood vessel function. The adverse effects observed with chemical flavor additives on endothelial cells could be early warning signs of future heart disease, researchers say. The health effects of "combustible" tobacco products including traditional cigarettes and hookah are well-established, but the potential dangers of e-cigarettes have not yet been extensively studied. E-cigarettes are battery-powered devices that heat a liquid -- including tobacco-derived nicotine, flavoring and other additives -- and produce an aerosol that is inhaled. Nine chemical flavorings -- menthol (mint), acetylpyridine (burnt flavor), vanillin (vanilla), cinnamaldehyde (cinnamon), eugenol (clove), diacetyl (butter), dimethylpyrazine (strawberry), isoamyl acetate (banana) and eucalyptol (spicy cooling) -- which are widely used in e-cigarettes, hookah, little cigars and cigarillos were tested for their short-term effects on endothelial cells, the cells which line the blood vessels and the inside of the heart. Researchers found all nine flavors were dangerous to cells in the laboratory at the highest levels tested and all the flavorings impaired nitric oxide production in endothelial cells in culture (outside of the body). Several of the flavorings -- menthol, clove, vanillin, cinnamon and burnt flavoring -- resulted in higher levels of an inflammatory marker and lower levels of nitric oxide, a molecule that inhibits inflammation and clotting, and regulates vessels' ability to widen in response to greater blood flow. "Increased inflammation and a loss of nitric oxide are some of the first changes to occur leading up to cardiovascular disease and events like heart attacks and stroke, so they are considered early predictors of heart disease," said lead study author Jessica L. Fetterman, Ph.D., assistant professor of medicine at Boston University School of Medicine in Massachusetts. "Our findings suggest that these flavoring additives may have serious health consequences." Endothelial cells were collected from volunteers users; six non-menthol and six men in the lab. Researchers found that those flavorings cause damage like those exposed commercially to the flavorings. Burnt flavor, impaired nitric oxide production and called interleukin-6 (IL-6) at all endothelium is particularly sensitive to the cells increased IL-6 at high concentrations even at low doses. In smokers, sci- cigarette smoke is overwhelmingly not a benign player, est levels tested, all nine chemicals levels cinnamon, clove, strawberry, Dimethylpyrazine/strawberry flavor elts, suggesting endothelial cells are especially sensitive to it. Vanillin and eugenol also increased oxidative stress in the cells. Three flavorings were tested when heated, to mimic what happens in e-cigarettes. Nitric oxide production was impaired with vanillin and eugenol, but not with menthol. "Our work and prior research have provided evidence that flavorings induce toxicity in the lung and cardiovascular systems. Flavorings are also a driver of youth tobacco use and sustained tobacco use among smokers," Fetterman said. A key strength of the new research was that it directly tested effects of just the flavorings, at levels likely to be reached in the body. Limitations include the fact that testing did not heat all the flavorings or include other chemicals used in e-cigarettes. Also, the study gauged just the flavorings' short-term effects and captured these with cells outside the body, not inside. "We still don't know what concentrations of the flavorings make it inside the body," Fetterman said. Most adult e-cigarette users are current or former combustible cigarette smokers who may use e-cigarettes as an aid in smoking cessation or as a harm-reduction tool. In addition, e-cigarette use by youth is rising rapidly with 37 percent of high schoolers reporting they have had an e-cigarette in 2015. Flavored tobacco products are a major driver of experimentation among youth. The American Heart Association cautions against the use of e-cigarettes, stating that e-cigarettes containing nicotine are tobacco products that should be subject to all laws that apply to these products. The Association also calls for strong new regulations to prevent access, sales and marketing of e-cigarettes to youth, and for more research into the product's health impact.

Biocon-Mylan Win US Nod For Another Biosimilar Drug

MUMBAI:- Biocon-Mylan Mob:

08040144014, 08028082808 won US approval for their second biosimilar drug on Tuesday, a little over six months after their first such offering was accepted. The US Food and Drug Administration approved pegfilgrastim, a drug used to increase the white blood count of cancer patients, Biocon

NSE -0.44 % and Mylan said in a statement on Tuesday. The drug, branded Fulphila, is a follow-on of the medicine developed by Amgen and has a market size of $4 billion. Biosimilars are emerging as the new class of affordable drugs that are replacing those with expired patents in the US.

Unlike generic medicines, the complex molecular structure of biosimilar drugs means pharmaceutical companies have to invest in additional research to prove that the efficacy of their versions is similar to the original.

Biosimilars are identical copies of highly complex biologic drugs, which are made through biotechnology, derived from natural sources or produced synthetically.
